it has also been found that this pattern of interference often causes the muscles of the neck and back to tighten, which decreases the ability of the body to properly drain infected fluids. It predicts as many as 552 million may have the disease by 2030.